

Creative Writing Essay: Organelles

Sports Announcer for World Series

The Eukaryotes vs. The Karyotic Pros

It's the bottom of the ninth inning here at Cell Wall Stadium. (You know, one of those stadiums that only allow some people in.) This is the last game of the World Series. Right now, the Eukaryotes are up to bat. Coach Bob Nucleus, the organelle who is in charge of the Eukaryotes, is shaking his head in the dug out. It hasn't been a good day for them so far. The score is 7 to 6, the Karyotic Pros are winning. Earlier today, Joe M. Lyosome, a great player on the Eukaryotes, struck out. Lyosome has been known to often wash the players' mouths out with soap when things get filthy. He is often called "the cleanser". At the bottom of the eighth, John Golgi also struck out. (He was the player to introduce Lyosome to the team.) Anyway, back to the game. Kyle Vacuole is up. If the team wins today, he has promised to take all the players out to lunch after the game. Ribosome is pitching. He throws the pitch and Vacuole hits it straight down the middle. The pitcher picks it up and throws it to first for an easy out. Coach Nucleus will have to work on getting him in better shape. Now it's Andy "ER" Reticulum at bat. (And no, he didn't get his nickname from the television series.) When he's not in the game, he often sends messages back and forth between the coach and the players. Ribosome throws a curve ball, but ER hits it into left field. The left fielder gets it on a bounce and throws it to second base. Andy has passed first and slides onto second before the second baseman catches it. I can hear some cheering coming from the dug out. It appears that the coach and his assistants, Jim Centri and Seth Ole, are screaming their hearts out down there. (Centri and Ole are mainly in charge of finding good players for the team.) Mike O. Chondria is also cheering. (He takes care of buying all the PowerAde for the players.) The coach decides to put his best player up at bat. He always saves this last player for the grand finale. This great player, although sometimes is ridiculed because of his color, is known to use all the heat and turn it into success. Jeff "Green" Chloroplast is now up. He swings once and misses. He tries again, but fails. The tension is on. Ribosome is sweating on the pitcher's mound. There's the pitch... and Chloroplast hits a homer! Andy Reticulum runs home and so does Mr. "Green". The crowd goes wild!! The Eukaryotes have won the World Series and will go home today as the national champions. And the Karyotic Pros have lost again. They had better go home and figure out a way to get a coach like Nucleus for their team.
